A YEAR IN REVIEW

The Mountain West market is seeing a shift towards normalization and long-term confidence. After years of rapid acceleration, conditions across many resort communities have shifted toward balance. Buyers are more measured, inventory has improved in select markets and strategic pricing has re-emerged as a defining factor in transaction velocity. Homes positioned correctly are moving, while aspirational pricing is being tested.

Luxury demand remains a consistent throughline. Trophy properties, ski-in/ski-out residences and architecturally distinct homes continue to command attention, reinforcing that scarcity and location still drive premium value. In several destinations, high-end activity is shaping overall market performance, even as broader segments settle into a more sustainable pace.

Infrastructure investment, resort expansion and new development are influencing buyer confidence across the region. From transformative mountain expansions to increased accessibility and evolving tax environments, the case for long-term value continues to build.

Across all markets represented, one theme is clear: the Mountain West remains a globally relevant lifestyle destination. Constrained supply, year-round recreation and enduring brand strength continue to anchor value, placing these resort communities alongside the world's leading alpine markets.

THE SINGLE FAMILY HOME MARKET IS VERY TIGHT, with fewer than 20 active listings; at times during 2025 there were as few as 10 available homes for sale. SELLERS CONTINUE TO HOLD THE NEGOTIATING POWER, with average list-to-sale price discounts below 5%. Historically Snowmass traded at a 45–50% discount to Aspen price per square foot, but that tightened to about 35% in 2025. This was the first year both homes and condos averaged over $2,000 per square foot, and UNDER-CONTRACT CONDOS NOW EXCEED $3,000 PER SQUARE FOOT.

The residential market has seen A CLEAR SHIFT TOWARD BUYERS, driven in part by elevated days on market. Homes priced correctly typically sold within about 70 days, while OVERPRICED LISTINGS LINGERED closer to 180 days, contributing to higher-than-normal inventory. Despite this, TRANSACTIONS INCREASED year over year as buyers remained drawn to the area's lifestyle. Market volatility, rising interest rates and higher insurance costs—pushing HOA dues up—gave buyers pause, but early price reductions by savvy sellers created compelling opportunities and allowed buyers more time to make thoughtful decisions.

global influences that impact your local market

Resort real estate does not operate in isolation. It is impacted by global markets, migration patterns, resort infrastructure investments and international sporting events.

Our strategic advantage delivers this up-to-the-minute research through the pages of the Sotheby's International Realty Luxury Outlook Report. From generational wealth shifts to long-term real estate market implications of lifestyle migration, this report provides forward looking intelligence no matter the location.

In our recently released 2026 report, featured article Game On explores how global sporting events influence luxury properties long after the closing ceremony. The research is clear: when infrastructure, international visibility and location branding align, the local markets often benefit from durable, long-term value drivers. Simply put, in resort markets, this perspective is actionable.

With our brand and network spanning more than 80 countries and territories, our connection and reach is realized through research and reporting. We sit at the intersection of global trends and local opportunity. In the pages that follow, you'll see this connection in action as we take our data a step further, showcasing the influence of the Milan Cortina games and mega resort passes on the international alpine markets of Italy.

enduring alpine appeal in the Dolomites

Amid the global attention surrounding the Milan–Cortina Winter Games, the Dolomites have stepped into an international spotlight. To understand how this exposure intersects with local market dynamics, we partnered with Italy Sotheby's International Realty for on-the-ground perspective from one of Europe's most established alpine destinations. This timely comparison to the 19 Mountain West markets featured in this report offers insight into how increased global awareness can influence real estate decisions across resort communities around the world.

How have the Milan/Cortina Winter Games impacted real estate?

In the Dolomites, the impact of the Winter Games has been tangible but highly selective. In Cortina d'Ampezzo and the surrounding valleys, we see accelerated demand in prime, supply-constrained micro-markets, particularly renovated properties, new builds and walk-to-lift residences. Infrastructure investments, international media exposure and the strengthening of Cortina's global brand have already reinforced its positioning as Italy's flagship alpine destination. However, we believe that the most significant positive effects on real estate demand, especially in terms of sustained international interest, will become more evident as global awareness increases and destinations are "proven" on an international stage.

In this sense, Milan–Cortina 2026 should be seen less as a short-term catalyst and more as a long-term value driver for the region. The uplift remains concentrated in areas where scarcity, quality infrastructure and strong branding were already present, reinforcing the resilience of prime alpine locations.

Has the growth of Italian ski partnerships with the Epic and Ikon passes increased US traffic?

Yes, and we now see measurable signals. The integration into global ski-pass ecosystems has significantly reduced barriers for North American visitors. Dolomiti Superski reported approximately 12,000+ Ikon pass holders mid-season, reflecting an estimated 30% year-over-year growth in that segment. This aligns with what we are observing locally, including more first-time US visitors and growing real estate inquiries from US buyers. Multi-resort passes function as a discovery platform: visitors experience the Dolomites through the pass ecosystem and, over time, some transition from tourism to property ownership, particularly in Cortina d'Ampezzo, Alta Badia and Val Gardena.

Are you seeing lifestyle migration similar to the US?

Not at the same scale seen in certain US resort counties, but a meaningful shift is underway. In the Dolomites, buyers are increasingly seeking longer stays, second homes and year-round usability supported by remote work, wellness and summer sports. Top alpine villages are evolving from purely winter destinations into four-season lifestyle hubs. Strict planning regulations and limited new development keep supply constrained. As a result, this remains a scarcity-driven market, with high-quality assets attracting strong competition.

Where are buyers coming from for Italian ski real estate?

Top feeder markets within driving distance include Northern Italy (Milan, Verona, Brescia, Bergamo, Bologna), Southern Germany, Austria and Switzerland. These buyers benefit from efficient road access and represent a stable, recurring demand base. Expanding markets internationally include the United Kingdom and United States, due to global ski-pass ecosystems (Epic & Ikon), improved international connectivity and strong relative value versus France and Switzerland.

What do you get for the money in Italian ski areas?

Pricing in Italy varies significantly by resort, micro-location and property condition. Prime markets such as Cortina d'Ampezzo, Alta Badia and Val Gardena average between €15,000–€30,000 per square meter (≈$1,640–$3,290 per square foot). Entry points within prime ski domains such as Arabba and Canazei (Sellaronda circuit) average €6,000–€8,000 per square meter (≈$660–$880 per square foot). Compared to France and Switzerland, Italy continues to offer a compelling value, benefiting from strong cultural appeal, gastronomy and a four-season lifestyle.
